Historically speaking, the final movie of any movie series is either really good or really bad.

Marvel Cinematic Universe with Avengers: Endgame - the end of an era - made the best look bad. It is one of the most satisfying movies ever.

Captain America turns out to be worthy for Thor's Mjolnir and saves him mid-fight. This was important for Cap's character as he is the righteous person, but Thor's fans will feel bad at this Endgame has been the best in every aspect but the time-travel related complexities. Marvel actually killed it by introducing a new time-travel timeline type, given that every other movie uses one of the conventional types. But they just skipped over some important details. We've seen dozens of minutes of screen-time spent on the birth of Vision and the Iron suit and the mini-arc reactor in the previous MCU movies, why not the time machine? This oversight in explaining the time travel bothers me. The whole infinity 'war' is 5 hrs long. This is a small setback, they should've gotten deeper into the time machine stuff.

That 4-second Peggy Carter and Steve Rogers scene was one of the most pleasing things. I would LOVE to see more of Nat. But she's getting a film all about herself, and that settles things. Loki didn't return but we have already mourned for him.

The best movie, I would like to watch it again and again. I had really enjoyed every minute of this wonderful movie, but we will miss IronMan.
