Stallworth is initially assigned to work in the records room, where he faces racial slurs from his coworkers. Stallworth requests a transfer to go undercover, and is assigned to infiltrate a local rally at which national civil rights leader Kwame Ture (birth name Stokely Carmichael) is to give a speech. At the rally, Stallworth meets Patrice Dumas, the president of the black student union at Colorado College. While taking Ture to his hotel, Patrice is stopped by patrolman Andy Landers, a corrupt, racist officer in Stallworth's precinct, who threatens Ture and sexually assaults Patrice. Release year=2018. 2H, 15 minute.

BlacKkKlansman

One telltale sign African-Americans have secretly invaded the KKK is if members take a knee during the Confederate National Anthem.

Fortunately, the black Klansman in this dramedy is only orally affiliated with the hate group. Ron Stallworth (John David Washington) makes a name for himself as Colorado's first black police officer by answering a Ku Klux Klan membership ad. Pretending to be white while speaking with David Duke (Topher Grace) Stallworth infiltrates the organization. But when the Klan asks to meet in-person, Stallworth has a white officer (Adam Driver) impersonate him.

Inspired by Stallworth's book, director Spike Lee takes a number of liberties with the source material in order to make the story timely and more impactful. While the levity of the script is startling, the performances are first-rate.

Conversely, you can tell the Black Panther Party has been infiltrated by whites when mayonnaise appears on the condiment table. Yellow Light.

Spike Lee's greatest film in my opinion. I don't know if the bad reviews are due to the heavy political message in the movie or not and, although I'm in favor of it and find it crucial theese days, I don't think it affects the quality of it. By itself it is a very well paced, humorous and thrilling movie.

I found the direction and photography incredible, Most of the time I was impressed by how well Lee has mastered his craft and found a group of professionals to work with that elevate his art.
