El hoyo movie synopsis. As a 94 minutes long metaphor- The Platform" is proof that you don't need astronomical budgets to make a worthy film. Obviously many interpreted it as a criticism of capitalism and overconsumption hence being pro-communist. But contrary to this notion I think it might indeed have a really strong case against communist ideology. By condemning capitalism, it simultaneously ridicules communist ideas for their futile attempt to tame human nature. At least the former had naturally occurring set of rules forced by nobody whereas to implement collectivist ideas you need to exert brute force as we witness Goreng and Bahart perform during their descent through the floors of the hole. At this point, it is impossible to overlook the direct reference to bloodshed of red revolutions who targeted upper and middle classes in order to provide for the so-called proletariat triggering catastrophic events.

Goring is presented to us as a Don Quixotesque figure who is celebrated for his irrationality on the face of reality and became a comical symbol for revolt against the threats that are not always tangible and real. That being said source of the problem here is not the system. No matter how flawless the system is, humans will always have imperfections contributing to its corruption.

Consequently, it is we who need to change after all. The need for the new kind of man is hinted at the end as the child starts to ascend with the platform.
