The Platform is a film centering around the will and strength of a person to survive in a poorish, government-controlled dystopia. Goreng, our main protagonist, is thrown into a government-controlled facility centered around hunger, where depending on your level, you may eat or starve and be forced to make unethical and terrible decisions. This idea is deliberately used by the writer to express current societal issues with the rich and the poor, especially with the pandemic going around. Just like any other film, it has its positives and negatives. To start the positives, The Platform does not hold back with its crisp and enticing cinematography, from scene to scene, different camera angles are used to not only show the message but also show our main protagonists descends to madness and, eventual rise and the acting only helps. Each person Goreng gets put with is a part of him. The writer uses an amazing plot device where each partner was apart of his soul being ripped out. From the old man being his lowest point and him purging himself from it by killing him, to the lady being Goreng's last hope in helping everyone in this madness with him, eventually perishing off by suicide, to finally, the black man being his strength and integrity to be free.

Another point to note, the last part of him is a black man, symbolizing the unity of his emotions, similar to the unity of multiculturalism. All these characters hold very bland personalities but are admissible because of the ideas explored, as they may just be his emotions. The film also does an amazing parallel to our protagonists' favorite meal, snails. He is compared to the one meal he favours the most, being stuck hopelessly and being tormented at a slow pace, similar to a snail. Unfortunately, this film holds many negatives with it. For one, the pacing from start to finish is very rushed and almost feels as if they were on a time limit to make this film under. From scene to scene, the audience is not able to fully understand and digest the dire circumstances our hero is venturing through. Furthermore, because of this, the dialogue is very clunky and unnatural at many moments. Additionally, exposition is thrown left, right and center because of this. It almost feels as if I am being told the story rather than viewing it myself. Many scenes are there to just tell the story rather than explore certain ideas. Because of this rushed pacing, a lot of character development occurs off-screen. The worst kind of character development. For example, early on in the film, when Goreng is coupled with the old man, the tragic side of him, he is shown to be a strong-willed man not sure of where he has landed. Instead of exploring his ultimate demise into the madness and eventually progressing towards becoming this old man, we are shown: few, little scenes and the rest are done off-screen with glimpses of what could have been. This film believes the character development is spectacular, rather it falls flat on its face. Due to this, many kills and deaths fail to be cathartic because they aren't earned. Also a quick mention, the idea of him being there for a diploma is stupid. It is a terrible connection and honestly doesn't help the audience feel any more connected to Goreng. Another thing to mention, the ending was amazing and terrible. In many aspects, it tells a beautiful finish to this story while also leaving a bit to the imagination of the audience, but also forces a lot, and I mean a lot, of exposition prior to finish it. I mean, they literally introduce a character and name him "Wise man" just so he could say something to wrap the story up, did they give up or something? There are plenty of plot contrivances that I will not mention because I am tired and want to sleep but overall the film has an amazing idea to explore but fails to do so in a storytelling manner.
