The movie was great until about half way through.

The idea that a mercenary paid to rescue a drug lords son, gets shafted but ends up rescuing the seemingly nice kid any way after flashbacks to his owns sons premature death is trite but OK, we can love with that.

The idea that the drug lords second in command is also making the ultimate sacrifice helping the rescue because otherwise his own family will be killed is also trite but OK.

Whats not OK - is that while this moral premise is being played out, of a rescue of an innocent, there seems to be several hundred innocent police offices ruthlessly slaughtered along the way, with a sort of deliberate unemotional distancing.

All the police, almost universally have their faces covered - almost as though the director is trying to turn them into simple targets that you're not supposed to think about.

So while we watch literally hundreds of police - who are presumably just following instructions to track down a mercenary, have their throats cut open, blown up, crushed by cars and riddled with bullets - the movie at the same time is trying to create a situation, where you feel this is OK because the mercenary isn't doing this any longer for money, but is doing it to protect the drug lord's son from a bad man.

We know this is a bad man, because we see his henchmen throwing children off a roof - but were you to tally up the death toll in this movie, it would seem the baddies kill about 4 innocent people, and the goodies several hundred.

The movie even sinks lower into its moralising by finishing off with an assassination of the baddie leader at the end as though that keeps the boy safe and then stupidly does a shadowy figure behind him as though 'but is he really safe.

For a brief second, the movie looked like it was going to flirt with realism, and then it descended into a pure body count and that thing that happens in a movie where despite being injured hundreds of times, the hero gets up and still kicks ass.

But oh well, first 30 minutes were watchable.
