It's definitely Not bad film but there was a lack of suspense and at times the film doesn't know if it wants to be a mystery or a comedy, it's a juggling act that at times drops the ball.

Still this is worth seeing, the performances are all great but I feel this could of been a lot better. Fully packed with excitement, wonderful cast, very interesting script, full of humours, and sarcastic. Though it's not entirely type of Sherlock Holmes movie, but the thrilling and mysterious enough to hold the audience attached to the screen. And surprisingly funny, with a satisfied twist at the end. Good people deserves to win.

The focus is lost amid several twists and turns, some predictable, some nonsensical, which is exactly what a twist shouldn't be. The direction is good, though there's a little too much bathos and again a loss of focus on the plot, which isn't the worst thing, since the plot falls apart. The movie feels about an hour too long and towards the middle you just want it to be over. It's a real shame, because it started so promising.

Wow! I just got out of the theater and I can honestly say this movie was absolutely perfect, there was humor that wasn't forced, pauses that weren't rushed, all connected with brilliant sound design. This is an absolute gem and I 100% think that it deserves a lot more praise than I have been seeing in reviews.

I want to start by giving props to the editor, this movie really allowed for pauses to build tension and create a very slow burning rhythm that compliments the story pushing both the stylistic and narrative components to further heights. However this is also a direct result of the preparation and execution of Rian Johnson and Steve Yedlin when it came to the production process. They use delayed whip pans to really give a very unique whimsical feeling when watching the film, this along with slow zooms and low angle shots advance the audiences perception of the cinematic world. Also I would like to add that this film has more ways of filming someone walking down a hallway than I thought possible. I think that it is important to also bring up the actors performances, I have to admit that after watching the trailers I dreaded seeing Chris Evans in his role as a deviant troublemaker because they cut out the most out of context lines creating a very cringe trailer but after seeing the film this couldn't be farther from the truth. He really broke out of his Captain America phase bringing a very noticeable stage presence, but Ana de Armas stole the show. She proved that she is not just a supporting actress giving a both developed and mature performance. It didn't hurt staring alongside the established actor Daniel Craig.

With all that being said I am rating this film a 9/10 because the final product is a fun experience that has something for everyone.
