Lady Bird is a fine film, replete with good acting and a paint-by-numbers, coming-of-age storyline every middle-class white person could find relatable, or at least relative. There's relative poverty, relative lies, relative places, and relative relatives.

The biggest lesson learned is that if you pay attention to the world around you, someone else might interpret that as love for the world around you, or at least the aspects of the world around you to which you pay attention are ones which you love, because why else would you pay so much attention to them, regardless of whether or not you are paying attention to them consciously?

Coming of age for Lady Bird includes a first weed, a first bone, and a first scratch-off. We get a prototypically gay young man, introduced as the strong singer who's afraid to touch mammaries. Perhaps greater screen time would have revealed he also enjoys architecture, query theory, and feather boas.

Having never lived in Sacramento, I nevertheless imagine I would also want to move to New York as a way to solve all of my problems. Change comes from within, unless you're full of wanderlust, without which we would wistfully remain stationary, only exploring inwardly who we are, who were were, and what will happen next.
