

introduced subplot intervenes.

Further, the exposition is among the worst I have ever heard. There is a scene early on in which Admiral Zhao blatantly and unnaturally tells most of Zuko's back-story felt more like a fake scene that somebody would film for a screen writing class as an exaggerated example of bad exposition. There are more examples (including the largely unneeded narration) but that was the worst.

I will, however, give the film credit on very few points. There is a scene in the big fight scene in which Aang must confront his own internal conflict that is quite well-done. That scene deserved to be in a much better movie. The fight scenes were good, as were the special effects.

At least two of the people with whom I watched this movie declared it a good movie (albeit one amended his commendation to say that the acting was not very good. This movie is a good example of a theory I am developing which I call, If it feels good, it is good. the name needs work. Basically, back in the day, there was a certain "feel" to good movies. It was much easier to tell good movies from bad ones because the bad ones tended to have much lower budgets and thus felt different. However, in recent years, more and more bad movie ideas are getting the same studio backing as good ones and those lines become heavily blurred.

As a result, there are plenty of just plain terrible movies that are being touted as works of cinematic genius.
