Based on the Nickelodeon series "Avatar: The Last Airbender, M Night Shyamalan's "The Last Airbender" takes us to a mythical world where four types of people with special powers dwell: those who can bend air (Airbenders) those who can bend water (Waterbenders) those who can bend earth (Earthbenders) and those who can bend fire (Firebenders. Then there's the one very special person who can do all four: the messianic figure known as the Avatar, who alone is able to maintain peace and order in an otherwise chaotic world.

Noah Ringer plays Aang, the youthful reincarnation of the many Avatars who preceded him. However, this Avatar is a bit reluctant to assume the title and thus all the personal responsibilities and sacrifices that come along with it. But Aang soon learns that he must fulfill his duty as spiritual leader of the world or the power-hungry Firebenders will become dictators over all the earth.

The movie was met with such a cacophony of outrage when it was released in 2010 that, in a way, I almost hate to add my voice to the chorus of "Airbender" bashers. (I suspect the vehemence of the reaction is as much a product of a generalized and almost irrational hatred of Shyamalan, as of the film itself. So I will start out on a positive note by saying that "The Last Airbender" is not quite as bad as I was expecting it to be, and that the premise of the story is actually quite interesting if you're into this sort of thing (which I'm generally not, though I must say that, if I were forced to choose, I'd opt for this over the "Narnia" films any day. But that's about as far as I'm willing to go in defense of the work, which ultimately struggles under the weight of derivative and frequently incoherent storytelling, wooden performances and decent but unspectacular special effects.

All in all, not a particularly good film – but not quite an unmitigated disaster either.
