Welp I have a new favorite Adam Sandler movie, and its name is Uncut Gems

Adam Sandler's degree of difficulty to make a shady, frenetic character likeable and maintain that persona throughout an entire movie: 10. Yet he achieved it.

If you doubt that such a role is immensely difficult, I invite you to watch a much-lesser-known movie that I saw earlier this year: Maxim Stoyanov in the supporting role of Dima in "Give Me Liberty." In that movie, the director seemed to realize a few days into principal photography that Stoyanov was much more charismatic than the lead, then he was torn between following the main character's story and Dima. Stoyanov tried to maintain his frenetic charm throughout the movie, but he was severely underserved by a fairly weak script and an indecisive director. He was also not as adept and experienced as Sandler, so his performance eventually caused Dima to seem like a two dimensional cartoon character. I got bored with him.

I was NEVER bored with Sandler in this movie. His performance and the supporting cast's performances always lent a realistic feeling to the production. Martin Scorsese is one of its executive producers, so I'm unsurprised that it's a great film.

I have minor complaints with this film. I disliked the loud, busy musical accompaniment that played when it was following Ratner in the city during our introduction to him. People were yelling over blaring non-diegetic music. Annoying. I also disliked that it ended in a way that all of us suspected that it was going to end. Again, minor complaints.
